Capital allocation theory; The study of investment ...

The General Theory of Capital Allocation. Capital allocation decisions should aim to maximize the company's intrinsic value per share as long as this is done in a legal and ethical way. Capital allocation decisions should be made using the idea of opportunity cost. All possible uses of capital should serve as opportunity cost for every other use, necessitating a comparison among all options in order to pick the optimal course.

The literature on the subject of capital allocation methods is very rich. Several principles have been proposed over the last twenty years. The most important and most studied are the Shapley method, the Aumann-Shapley method and the Euler's method. The Shapley method is based on cooperative game theory. It is described in detail in Denault's

We examine the shareholder value implications of CBA's acquisition of Colonial in 2000 as a case study in poor capital allocation.. We calculate that the acquisition destroyed $53 billion in shareholder value relative to investing in the other major banks, equating to $30 per CBA share.. We believe the true value destruction was probably greater than our calculation given the low benchmark ...
