Cerebral Palsy Resource For Speech

In fact, a 2012 study conducted by Swedish researchers found that speech problems affect more than half of all children with cerebral palsy. Some children with cerebral palsy have difficulty controlling the muscles in their face, throat, neck and head. This can lead to troubles with speech, chewing and swallowing. It can also cause drooling and affect overall ability to interact and learn. Those who also have difficulty hearing may have a hard time understanding spoken language.

Speech Therapy for Cerebral Palsy - Improving Communication

People with cerebral palsy may experience difficulties with communication in areas such as speech, the development of gesture and facial expression, receptive and expressive language and voice production. Learning to communicate with others, and ensuring that you're understood in return, is a vital part of every child's early development.
